We celebrate to-day a double anniversary: of the foundation of our organized national life and of the completed fame of the first man in the heroic age of our history. But the celebration could not be divided. The triumph of Washington and the founding of the nation are two aspects of the same event. The flag is the copy of his armorial device; the constitution is the inspiration of his self-contained and orderly intellect; the nation itself is the realization of his ambition and the expression of his character.

I thus venture to anticipate the judgment of future times. The first age of the republic is now finished. The two sections of the country are at last united in interest and will soon be united in sympathy and in action. The theory of the government is settled. It is true, indeed, that no person can yet undertake to write the history of the century in which these things have been accomplished. The history of an age must be written by comparison with the times which follow as well as those which precede. Results, in the action of nations, correspond with motives in the actions of men; and as the moral Speech.

The House being in Committee of the whole, on the following resolution, reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations.

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of the House, it is expedient to appropriate the funds necessary to enable the President of the United States to send Ministers to the Congress of Panama."

The amendment offered by Mr. M'Lane, of Delaware, being also before the Committee, in the following words:

"It being understood, as the opinion of this House, that, as it has always been the settled policy of this Government, in extending our commercial relations with foreign nations, to have with them as little political connexion as possible, to preserve peace, commerce, and friendship, with all nations, and to form entangling alliances with none; the Ministers who may be sent shall attend the said Congress in a diplomatic character merely; and shall not be authorized to discuss, consider or consult upon any proposition of alliance, offensive or defensive, between this country and any of the Spanish American Governments, or any stipulation, compact, or declaration, binding the United States in any way or to any extent, to resist interference from abroad with the domestic concerns of the aforesaid Governments, or any measure which shall commit the present or future neutral rights or duties of these United States, either as may regard European nations, or between the several States of Mexico and South America; leaving the United States free to adopt, in any event which may happen, affecting the relations of the Spanish American Governments, with each other, or with foreign nations, such measures as the friendly disposition, cherished by the American People, towards the People of those States, and the honour and interest of this nation may dictate."

And Mr. RIVES, of Virginia, having moved to amend the amendment of Mr. M'Lane, by inserting the following, after the words "aforesaid governments," where those words occur, in the the 12th 13th lines:

"Or any compact or engagement by which the United States shall be pledged to the Spanish American States, to maintain, by force, the principle, that no part of the American continent is henceforward subject to colonization by any European power"—

Mr. RIVES, of Virginia, rose, and said, he was admonished, by every consideration of a personal nature, to abstain from any participation in the present discussion. No one could be more sensible than himself how little ability he possessed, at any time, to assist the deliberations of this House, and that ability, small as it was at all times, was now materially lessened by the effects of long continued infirmity. Nevertheless, he was urged, by an impulse which he

THE CONVICTED LIBELLER.

To the Hon. F. O. J. SMITH:

Sir:—You are the happy proprietor of a Newspaper in the City of Portland, called The Advertiser—at least, so I am told. In that paper you recently caused mention to be made, incidentally of course, of the libel suit which I brought against you, and in which you were convicted With that conviction you professed your discontent, and avowed your intention to appeal from the verdict and judgment which threatened to take fifteen hundred dollars from that fortune which you must be saving for your creditors, since you never pay any one. I waited for your appeal or your money for some time. At last you abandoned your appeal, and paid the amount of the judgment and the costs.

It is now time for me, personally, to attend to you, and to exhibit you to the community, as that trial exhibited you to those who heard it. What I think of you myself is of no consequence to any one but myself, and will not be obtruded here: but what the facts brought out upon that trial compelled people to think of you, and to say of you, I am sure you are entitled to, and it shall be my care not to take away from you even the most insignificant portion of your right to it.

If, upon the arrival of a foreign steamer, a speculator could get and keep exclusive possession of her news for half a day, it is perfectly plain that he would have enormous and intolerable advantages over all others. To prevent this, the chief newspapers in the United States have for a long time employed a large organized force, and an agent to direct it. One of the duties of this agent
